Australia

Australian Whisky holds a rich history within the country with the industry beginning in 1820.

Generally following similar distillation methods as the Scottish, the lack of legislation regarding the production means the nuance of flavours and complexity is highly unique within the international Culture.

The production of whisky within Australia occurs throughout the country with the exemption of queensland due to its climate being more suited to the production of rum.

Scotland

Scotch Whisky, generally made of barley and grain is more or less what we think of when we think of whisky. Being aged for a minimum of three years after distillation within oak barrels giving it several different flavour characteristics.

With the regions of Islay, Highland, Lowland, Speyside and Campbeltown, there is somewhere around 141 different distilleries around the country.

Scotch tends to have a minimum ABV of 40% by volume but can reach well into the 60% range.

Highland / Lowland

The highlands are by far the largest region of whisky within Scotland, with over 30 massive distilleries we tend to look at flavours of fruit cakes, spice, sweetness, caramel.

The Lowlands produce flavours of whisky that are softer, floral and sweeter notes that tend to be lighter on the pallet.

Islay

Along the Scottish Isles are a massive series of distilleries that produce medium bodies, peaty, smokey and iodine saturated pours. Synonymous with what most will refer to as 'smokey' or harsh, these whiskys bring forward many interesting and complex flavours for old and new drinkers. With unique ingredients such as mossy water, the broadness of flavour is intriguing and a great place to start your whisky journey.

Speyside

The Speyside region of whisky production gets its name from the River Spey that cuts through the region, further offering much of the water to the surrounding distilleries. The flavour profiles that you can expect are deep and rich, with powerful floral notes, sweetness, spice, fruitiness and caramel.

Campbelltown

The smallest Whisky Producing region in Scotland is a small coastal section of Scotland. At one point home to 30 distilleries it is now home to only 4. Described as the flavour of wet wool, although not sounding appealing, we can assure you it very much is.

Irish Whisky

Made on the island of Ireland, if anyone knows how to make drink, it'd be the Irish. Being one of the oldest countries in Europe to start distillation in the 12th century. With little to no peat within their whiskies the flavours that come out are smooth and complex, often floral with notes of citrus. There are several different forms of Irish whisky to explore with unique distillation methods using coffey still. Continuing to be a huge industry today there is plenty to choose from in terms of different distilleries and flavours.

Japan

The production of whisky in Japan Begun in the 1870's. Broadly, the style of whisky produced is very similar to that of scotch. With an extreme attention to detail that has lead to a level of smoothness that is almost unmatched across the globe, Japanese whisky is pleasurable to drink for those at the beginning or well into their whisky journey. Much of the products produced by these distilleries is highly sought after and incredibly difficult to get a hold of at a reasonable price outside of private sales and through bars.

France

Like their wine, French Whisky offers complex and sweet flavours. With big notes of sherry, tannins and caramel it's very hard to go wrong when drinking French Whisky. Having one of the larger selections of French whisky that is available within bars, we absolutely recommend giving it a chance even if it isn't your usual go to.
